Uk online shopping for electronics

An Interview With Brian CooleyCooley is a general editor for CNET, a website that reviews technology. Nowadays, there is really no excuse to be scamming when buying a new TV, camera or computer, as there is so much information at your fingertips. Do your research, ask the right questions, and you'll end up with a bargain, not a lemon. • ___ Consider your options. ___ Before you buy anything, first look at the unbiased product reviews and best selections from publishers on sites like ZDNet, PCWorld and, of course, CNET. Then learn more about the models you like on the manufacturer's website. The version that costs $100 less may only lack a feature you didn't want anyway. • ___ Get an idea of it. ___ Try the item in a store like Best Buy or Circuit City, it's important to experience the image quality of a flat-screen TV or digital camera design. Compare store price with what you saw online during your research. If similar, buying in a large chain has advantages: they have good return policies, and you don't have to pay for shipping. • ___ Click and save. ___ Still, Internet merchants offer the lowest prices as they have almost no overhead and do not usually charge sales taxes (which can be a big savings). Just be sure to deal with a reputable site certified by a consumer protection group like Verisign, Bizrate, or Better Business Bureau Online, and make sure its returns policy doesn't haunt you with a 25 percent replenishment fee. If the site does not prominently list a street address and an 800 number for customer service, that is also a red flag,—go somewhere else. • ___ Keep out. ___ If you want the most up-to-date electronics, wait until September. That's when most new items arrive in stores and online. Otherwise, look for rebates after Christmas. • ___ Protect yourself. ___ Most electronic devices are well made, so you probably don't need an extended warranty. The only exception is laptops. They can be delicate and expensive to fix, so you can recover the cost of the warranty when yours inevitably shrinks.
